EXPLORING HORIZONS

travel/adventure
docu-series

Early explorers set out to chart a world that had yet to be discovered. Thousands of years later, we've mapped the world, crossed the globe and seen it all. So what inspires the modern explorer? Human curiosity. We know a lot about the planet, but not each other.

Exploring Horizons visits those places where civilization moved in without taking over, and where, for generations, communities have been shaped by their natural environments. The remote reaches of Patagonia, the ancient medinas of North Africa and the isolated sub-Arctic frontier all have one thing in common: it's the people that make them unique in the ways they experience life.

In these isolated pockets of civilizations, Flight is often a lifeline to the outside world. It's also a means to explore. The Exploring Horizons aerial perspective extends far past the usual boundaries. Flyers of all varieties share their favorite flightpaths, and from the open air cockpit of the Exploring Horizons ultralight, it's a gateway to a different world.

Far out destinations, unusual perspective, fascinating storytellers, together, these elements achieve a unique portrait of each place and inspire us to see our world through different eyes. Exploring Horizons looks at what brings us together as people, what sets us apart as individuals, and what ignites our passion to explore.
